An experimental study on shooting ability of male archers: With reference to specific yoga exercises

Kapil Kumar Sahu and Dr. Jai Shankar Yadav

Abstract

The performance of archers is reliant on varied factors. These factors range from biomechanical, physical, physiological to psychological. The beneficial effect of yoga on physical, physiological and psychological functioning has been advocated in so many scientific studies. The research gap is regarding the effect of specific yoga exercises on performance parameter of male archers. This study is directed to address this issue by means of an experimental study. To conduct the study 100 national level male archers were selected. In the pre-post test experimental design, the male archers were divided in two groups namely experimental and control group. The yogic exercise program prepared by Patanjali Yogpeeth Haridwar was used in this study. The shooting ability of male archers was assessed with a target placed at 70 meters. The male archers placed in experimental group were subjected to 06 months yogic exercise program apart from regular training schedule of male archers from both the groups. The data was collected two times. Results reveal that after completion of 06 months study time period, the shooting ability of male archers from experimental group was significantly higher as compared to male archers from control group. It was concluded that 06 months specific yogic exercise program enhances shooting ability of male archers.

Abstract

The word competence means certain characteristics or skills that is necessary to execute some task effectively. An emotionally competent person is capable of understanding and coping with emotional situations. The role of emotions in sports psychology has been thoroughly described and linkage with sports performance and emotions has been clearly defined although with certain contradictions. Like any other sport role of emotions in archery performance has been highlighted and certain psychological program has been advocated to enhance emotional competence in archers. One such age old practice is yoga and its psychological and emotional benefits are widely discussed but there is no scientific evidence that yoga is useful in enhancing emotional competence of archers. To deal with this issue, the researcher selected 100 national level male archers (Average age 22.89 years) to carry out this work. To adhere to research design, these male archers were divided and placed into experimental and control group. The emotional competence of male archers was assessed by scale prepared by Sharma and Bhardwaj (1998). The six months yoga practices program was designed on the guideline of Patanjali Yogpeeth Haridwar. During the span of 06 months study period the male archers from experimental group were subjected to specific yogic practices. The male archers from experimental and control group also continued their regular daily practice and training schedule. The pre-post data on emotional competence was collected by administering the scale of Sharma and Bhardwaj (1998). Results reveal significantly superior emotional competence in male archers from experimental group as compared to male archers from control group after the completion of study period of 06 months. It thereby concluded that 06 months of yogic practices is good for improving the emotional competence in male archers.
